invention relates to a method for programming a flash memory, and more particularly, to a method for simultaneously programming a flash memory, using a common reference bit line. A flash memory device may be programmed using a Fowler-Nordheim tunneling effect, but its endurance decreases as the programming voltage applied to the gate is increased. Furthermore, a conventional flash memory device programming method writes into the memory cells using a voltage of 6-7V. The high programming voltage is related to a large internal resistance of the flash memory device. If a large current is used to reduce the programming time, the internal resistance of the flash memory device will be increased further. In a conventional flash memory, the devices will be programmed sequentially. f678ea9f9e
